The Los Angeles Scholars Investment Fund (LASIF) was established in 2012 as a partnership between the California Community Foundation (CCF) and the College Futures Foundation to increase college access and success in L.A. County. Since its inception it has awarded $25 million in grants and has grown to become one of the largest college attainment initiatives in L.A. County.

Equity gaps between students based on their race, ethnicity and income directly impact their ability to thrive academically. Only half of all L.A. County students complete high school with the classes required to apply to a four-year college, and just one in five students enrolled in a public university in L.A. County will graduate within four years. LASIF’s unique approach evaluates grantmaking decisions through the lens of college completion to reach beyond admission. Multi-year scholarships are combined with college access and holistic support services proven to address the multifaceted needs of vulnerable students.
While the core LASIF model has remained consistent over its ten-year history, the initiative has undergone important evolutions in response to student needs. In 2017, LASIF added the Young Men of Color Initiative to better integrate specific strategies that support male students. In 2019, the Relief from Urgent Student Hardship (RUSH) Fund was launched to help students struggling to meet basic living expenses persist towards their postsecondary aspirations.

LASIF scholars to date, of whom over 90% are Pell Grant or CA Dream Act recipients and more than 91% identify with race/ethnicity groups historically underrepresented in higher education, are completing postsecondary degrees far faster and at higher rates than local and national averages.

There is no greater weapon than knowledge and no greater tool than education. These words resonate deeply with Amanda Abito, who from a young age, understood the value of obtaining a higher education, but struggled navigating a system that does not always provide students with access to the resources they need to succeed.

“There is no-one-size-fits all solution when it comes to learning. Having access to an alternative high school program allowed me to re-discover my passion for learning and changed the course of my life.”

Amanda not only found a school model that worked for her, but she also benefited from programming offered by Sharefest, a grantee of LASIF, that works with youth from underserved L.A. neighborhoods. Sharefest empowers youth through leadership development, college preparation workshops, campus field trips and mentoring.

Through Sharefest’s creative writing class Amanda was able to connect with a trusted mentor who believed in her potential and encouraged her to seek out opportunities she might have passed on, such as the LASIF Action Research Fellowship. “My mentor’s support was instrumental in helping me build my self-confidence. There were times when I sold myself short because I wasn’t attending a prestigious ivy league school and I struggled with social anxiety. I perceived those things as limitations when they were merely challenges that could be overcome.”

Amanda, who is now 20 years old, is finishing her second year at Los Angeles Harbor Community College where she will earn three AA degrees before transferring to a four-year university. Community college allowed Amanda to take advantage of The LA College Promise initiative which waives tuition for the first two years of college for youth graduating from LA Unified high schools.

“I will always be an advocate for community college because it offers great advantages for students such as lower tuition and fees and a more flexible curriculum and class schedule. I was given the opportunity to receive a college education debt free and although my academic goals move beyond community college, I believe the education I am receiving will serve as a solid foundation for my future.”

That future is full of possibilities for this young scholar whose personal mission is to enrich the lives of others in her community. “I look forward to finding a career path that allows me to merge my love of writing and storytelling with community service to become a champion for higher education.”

Throughout its ten-year trajectory, LASIF has impacted the lives of over 38,000 students by supporting community organizations who provide low-income youth with an array of safety net services to ensure they have the support they need to get into college and graduate.
College was on Jahmeel’s radar since he was in 5th grade, but it was not something he thought was tangible. “The process of preparing and applying to college can be extremely overwhelming because you don’t know where to start.” First-generation students face barriers such as financial burdens and inequitable access to guidance and resources, making their college experience more challenging as they navigate a new environment for the first time. These barriers are compounded for Black students who are directly impacted by the side-effects of structural racism.

“I was fortunate to have the opportunity to attend a high school that challenged me academically and offered college prep classes, but that wasn’t enough. I needed some additional guidance and an action plan.”

Jahmeel was able to receive the support and guidance he needed from an organization called the Fulfillment Fund who was working with youth at his high school. The Fulfillment Fund, a grantee of LASIF, offers an array of college access support services such as in-class college access instruction, one-on-one college counseling and financial aid advising.

Through the Fulfillment Fund Jahmeel was able to connect with a college counselor who believed in him and helped him build his confidence to pursue his dream of a higher education. “Having that additional support from a college counselor was instrumental for me because I didn’t know how to navigate the system and didn’t know what to expect. I didn’t even know if I could become a successful college student.” Jahmeel continued to receive personalized support from Fulfillment Fund staff throughout his four years in college, which increased his odds of graduating.

Jahmeel earned his bachelor’s degree in Political Science from UC Merced in May 2016, becoming the first in his family to earn a four-year degree. He is a young professional whose passions range from giving back to his community to pursuing his creative ventures.

“I owe my success to my mother who always believed in me and to the small community who rallied around me and provided me with the tools and resources I needed to pursue my dreams.”

Throughout its ten-year trajectory, LASIF has impacted the lives of over 38,000 students by supporting community organizations who provide low-income youth with an array of safety net services to ensure they have the support they need to get into college and graduate.
What is next?

The lessons learned in these last ten years reiterate the importance of giving beyond a single scholarship toward an integrated set of opportunities to help build brighter futures for young Angelenos. In 2021, the LASIF team commenced a strategic refresh process that engaged various partners. Insights were garnered through a range of approaches including action research led by LASIF scholars, quantitative analysis of LASIF scholar postsecondary trajectories, subject matter experts and key constituent listening sessions.

Beginning in 2022, LASIF will focus more explicitly on multi-sector, multi-agency partnerships that support underrepresented students to obtain a postsecondary credential or degree. In addition to a greater focus on place or population-based collaborations, use of student aid funding will expand to consider additional methods such as emergency grants and paid internships support, as well as more traditional scholarships. Finally, the prioritization of bachelor's degrees was amended to be more inclusive of the multiple postsecondary institutions and pathways that support economic and social mobility.
